

Remembrance Poppy

The red poppy, which became a national emblem of remembrance in 1920, is worn to honor and memorialize those who gave their lives to protect our country's freedom. It's historical roots date back to World War I, when a Lieutenant Colonel was overcome with sorrow after a battle in the poppy-covered Flanders Field in Belgium. The Colonel wrote a poem to channel his grief, called "In Flanders Fields".

This poem caught the eye of a professor at the University of Georgia, and she vowed to always wear a red poppy in remembrance of those who had been left behind. She lobbied to make the red poppy a national memorial symbol, and on September 27, 1920, the red poppy officially became the U.S. national emblem of remembrance.

Red poppies are donned on Memorial Day and also on National Poppy Day. The American Legion Auxiliary - female relatives of wartime veterans, is the main group that raises money through the distribution of crepe-paper poppies. These poppies are handcrafted by veterans and provides them wages and a therapeutic outlet.
